1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a pressurized rocket engine and more specifically relates to a staged pressure-fed rocket engine. 2. Prior Art In the past, a variety of engine systems have been utilized for propulsion. Many of these engine systems have consisted of a single stage rocket motor which is utilized in systems such as space launches, missiles, fuel bound aircraft, and water driven aircraft. A single stage rocket motor includes a single chamber which is filled with a combustible mixture of fuel and oxidizer. After ignition of the combustible mixture, the single stage rocket motor achieves sufficient velocity and momentum to propel the rocket motor beyond the single rocket motor chamber. Pressure-fed rocket engines such as the Rocketdyne engine as well as hot gasses pumping engines are also single stage rocket motor type engines. These single stage rocket motors must operate at extremely high chamber pressures. Because the rocket motors require such high chamber pressures, they can have only a single combustion chamber. With this in mind, multiple stage rocket engines were developed to provide satisfactory high chamber pressures while keeping the engines light and compact. However, the use of multiple stages in a single rocket engine or multiple rocket engines has several drawbacks. Since these rocket engines include a number of sealed chambers, the prior art rocket engines are highly complex and maintenance intensive. Also, because multiple rocket engines must be operated sequentially, the propellant loading, launch, and flight times are often limited. Therefore, it would be advantageous to provide a rocket engine including both single and multiple stage pressure-fed rocket motors so as to provide the high chamber pressure while keeping the rocket engines simple and maintenance-free. Furthermore, it would also be advantageous if such a rocket engine could be tested and proven for efficiency and safety.

Patient Monitoring and Automation Systems Our manufacturing experience combined with our goal for quality and excellence is reflected in our internal monitoring systems as well as our smart systems for patient monitoring. The JANUS system provides nurses and health care professionals with an accurate on-line continuous monitoring of patients in intensive care units, step-down units, neonatal and pediatric patients. The system provides the highest available level of operational information on the patient, the equipment and the environment.
